disaster to him. On his return he found his little home broken up, furniture soid out and wife field to parts unknown. He went crazy, was picked up by the police Saturday and placed behind from hars in the adams street stationhouse. That night in his deniented rage, he attempted to break his bead by bucking it against the iron grating of his prison door. When found by Mr. Forrest, the stationhouse-keeper, the blood was flowing in torrents down his face from the wounds in his head, and he drank the raddy stream as it fell. He would pause occasionally in his suicidal operation to catch the blood in his mouth, crying out with a demandate of the chain-gang and submitted to be plintened without much resistance. He seemed to be exhausted from loss of blood and violent exertion. While the men were making him first with cords and things, he kept hurmaring about his wife.
